Potential Indirect Impacts of the COVID-19 Pandemic on Children

There is increasing global concern about the likely disproportionate impact of the current pandemic on children experiencing adversity, widening existing disparities in child health and developmental outcomes.

The Medical Journal of Australia suggests five potential strategy areas that could begin to address these inequities.

Menstruation and COVID-19 Vaccination

Vaccination against COVID-19 provides protection against the potentially serious consequences of SARS-CoV2 infection, but as the vaccines were rolled out into younger age groups, clinicians were increasingly approached by patients worried that the vaccine had caused a change to their periods.

The future of digital mental health in the post-pandemic world

The pandemic has led to one of the biggest surges in uptake of digital health interventions, although not always by choice.

Yet, this has also been a time of anxiety and there is an undeniable desire to return to our old lives and old ways of working.

Hence, it may be an opportune moment to examine the role of digital health interventions in the near future.

Learn about how digital trends in mental health can be Evidence-based, blended, responsive and implementable in the Australian & New Zealand Journal of Psychiatry.
